If so, please describe using the Resource Request link.	Reflection	Anonymous	It's easy to point to attendance as a reason why students don't excel in a particular class. For this class that is true. More than any class in that I have taught in the last two years, several students were plagued with excessive absences. At least one that I know of had a medical excuse. The rest, I don't really know what was going on. This class was the first class of the day, and a few times students missed parts of my class because they were meeting with their TIL staff members. I don't know if these were scheduled by the staff, or just drop ins by the students, but it did seem like the staff often didn't know that the students had class. But there was also at least two students who often just didn't come to class and had no excuse for it. That being said, I can do a better job of staying in communication with students who miss class. I should get email addresses from them next semester, so that I can contact them about missed assignments. In the fall last semester, I started sharing mid semester grades with them and explaining to each student how missing classes affected their grade. I continued that practice this semester, and included the number of classes needed to attend in order to pass. Keeping the students informed seem to help the students who were missing a lot of classes early in the semester stay on track, unfortunately one student started missing a lot of class after that for a unknown reason. Maybe I can do grade updates every four weeks.	2017-05-05
